Comment on the character of the Knight. [2020] ☆☆☆

Or, How does the narrator describe the Knight? [2016]

In “The General Prologue to The Canterbury Tales”, Geoffrey Chaucer (1340-1400) begins his story with the Knight. He is the most noble and respected pilgrim at the Tabard Inn in Southwark. Through him, Chaucer shows the true spirit of chivalry and honour.

A Brave and Noble Warrior: The Knight is a man of courage and faith. Chaucer says,

“A Knyght ther was, and that a worthy man.”

(A KNIGHT there was, and that (one was) a worthy man.)

He has fought many battles for truth and religion. He fought bravely in many lands like Alisaundre, Lettow, Ruce, and also across the Great Sea. He has been in fifteen deadly wars and always fights for the Christian faith. Yet he is never proud. Chaucer admires him as,

“A verray, parfit gentil knyght.”

His bravery is noble, and his heart is pure.

A Man of Humility and Gentle Nature: Though famous and strong, the Knight is humble. He never speaks rude words to anyone. After many wars, he comes straight from battle to join the pilgrimage to Canterbury. His clothes are simple. His dress was marked by armour stains. This shows his modest heart and true service.

A True Example of Chivalry and Honour: The Knight's character joins bravery, truth, and kindness. He fights for faith, not fame. His honesty, politeness, and respect for others make him ideal. He believes in justice and peace. Even the narrator respects him deeply. Chaucer's tone is full of love and honour for this noble man.

The Knight stands as the finest figure among all the pilgrims. He is brave in war and gentle in peace. Chaucer's Knight is the perfect image of medieval chivalry. He is a man of faith, courage, and pure heart.
