Justify the title of the poem “The Waste Land.” [NU: 2022]

Or, “The Waste Land” is a sigh for the vanished glory of the past - Explain. [NU: 2015, 20] ★★

To justify a literary title is to explain how it suits the story. T. S. Eliot (1888-1965) published “The Waste Land” in 1922. The title suggests a land of barrenness, death, and despair. It reflects modern Europe after the First World War. The poem shows both present sterility and the lost glory of the past. Thus, the title is fitting and deeply symbolic.

Spiritual Barrenness: The land is spiritually empty. Eliot writes of “a heap of broken images” where nothing grows. The Wastelanders are lifeless, like ghosts crossing London Bridge. April, usually a joyful month, becomes cruel here.

“April is the cruellest month,”

The barrenness of the soul makes the title justified.

Moral and Sexual Corruption: Love has become meaningless. In “The Fire Sermon,” the clerk and the typist meet without passion. Lil’s story in “A Game of Chess” shows the same emptiness. Corruption of sex and loss of purity reflect a true wasteland of values.

Echo of Lost Traditions: The poem often recalls the glory of past culture. Eliot mentions myths of the Fisher King, Philomela, and the Holy Grail. These symbols once meant hope, fertility, and meaning. But in the present, they survive only as fragments. This shows a sigh for the vanished past.

Search for Renewal: “The Waste Land” is not only death but also desire for rebirth. Eliot ends with the Upanishadic words:

“Datta, Dayadhvam, Damyata.”

The repetition of “Shantih shantih shantih” suggests hope for peace. Thus, the poem longs for the regeneration of the dead land.

In conclusion, the title “The Waste Land” reflects a world of death, sterility, and despair. It also mourns the lost cultural glory of the past. At the same time, it sighs for renewal, waiting for peace. Thus, the title is perfectly justified.
