Write a short note on Beelzebub.

The word Beelzebub is derived from Hebrew, which means The lord of Flies. The epic poem was written by In John Milton's (1608-1674) epic poem "Paradise Lost" (1667), Beelzebub is the mighty fallen next to Satan. He is Satan's chief lieutenant.

Second-in-Command to Satan: Beelzebub is portrayed as Satan's closest supporter. He is the most trusted advisor of Satan. He stands beside Satan throughout their rebellion against God and their fall from Heaven. Milton introduces him as the next in power to Satan. It indicates his high rank among the fallen angels.

Wise and Fluent: Beelzebub is known for his wisdom and fluency. He often helps express and refine Satan's plans. After Satan's initial speech to the fallen angels, Beelzebub adds his thoughts, presenting ideas in a persuasive and thoughtful manner:

That with sad overthrow and foul defeat

Hath lost us Heav'n,

Supporter of Deception:

Beelzebub supports the shift from open war to deceitful tactics against God. He acknowledges their defeat in battle but suggests that they could still achieve their goals through cunningness. This strategic thinking reveals his deceptive nature.

Role in Future Plans: Beelzebub's ideas significantly influence Satan's decisions. When Satan speaks, the fallen angels draw their flaming swords and prepare for action:

"Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thighs."

Beelzebub supports him. His suggestion to investigate the new world and potentially corrupt its inhabitants becomes a crucial part of their strategy. This plan sets the stage for the events that follow, particularly Satan's journey to Earth.

In termination, Beelzebub is a central figure in "Paradise Lost", He acts as Satan's second-in-command and a key strategist. His wisdom, fluency, and support for cunning plans make him a vital part of the fallen angels.
