The author's position in "The Good Morrow".

John Donne (1572-1631), a famous poet, talks about true love in The Good Morrow (1633). He shares his own feelings and thoughts about love. Donne believes that real love makes life better and connects two people deeply. The poem shows how love can bring happiness and unity.

Subjective: The author speaks from his own experience, so his view is subjective. Donne starts by wondering what his life was like before he truly loved. He feels that his past joys were small and unimportant. Now, his love has given him a new and better life. Donne says that love has made him and his beloved so close that they share the same world. He compares their love to two perfect halves that fit together without any flaws.

Donne believes true love is pure and never-ending. He thinks that when love is equal and strong, it will never fail. The poem shows how love can wake up the soul and make life more meaningful. Donne uses his personal feelings to describe the power of love. His words remind us how love can change everything for the better.
