What is the attitude of the poet you find in "Delight in Disorder"?

In Robert Herrick's (1591-1634) poem "Delight in Disorder" (1634), the poet shows a special attitude towards imperfections. He celebrates small mistakes and disorganized details in a woman's dress. According to him, these flaws make the person more attractive than perfect, careful order.

The poet enjoys seeing a little disorder. He likes it when clothes are not perfectly arranged. For example, he describes a loose lace or a cuff that is not properly done. These little mistakes make the dress more beautiful. They add a sense of freedom and charm.

Herrick uses words like "distraction" and "wild civility" to describe how these small mistakes are lovely. He believes that perfection is not always the best. When everything is too neat and exact, it can look boring. A small, imperfect detail, like a messy shoe-string, can make a person look more lively and interesting. The poet sees beauty in these small errors because they show naturalness. They show that a person is not trying too hard to be perfect. Instead, they let their personality shine through.

In this poem, Robert Herrick tells us that sometimes, the best beauty comes from disorder. He teaches us to appreciate imperfections. They are what make life more exciting and full of character. Perfection is not always the most attractive thing.
