

Which period is Called The Romantic Revival and why?

Generated: Jan 26, 2026

The period of English Literature between 1785 and 1830, or the Romantic Period (1798 - 1832), is called the "Romantic Revival." This era shifted from the neoclassical style to a new approach emphasizing individualism, imagination, and emotion.

The cause of mentioning the Romantic Revival

Reaction to the Enlightenment:

The Enlightenment was a period of rationalism, where reason and logic were highly valued. However, the Romantics reacted against this movement and emphasized the importance of emotion, nature, and individuality.

Love for Nature: The Romantics were highly inspired by nature, and they saw it as a source of beauty, truth, and inspiration. This love for nature was reflected in their literature, which often included descriptions of landscapes, seasons, and the natural world.

Focus on Imagination: The Romantics believed that imagination was crucial to understanding the world, and they valued the power of the individual's imagination to create new ideas and meanings.

Emphasis on Emotions: The Romantics emphasized the importance of emotions, powerful and intense feelings like love, joy, and sadness. They believed that emotions were the key to human experience and understanding.

Interest in Folklore and Mythology: The Romantics were fascinated by folklore and mythology and often incorporated these elements into their writing. They saw these stories as a way to connect with the past and understand the human experience.

Individualism: The Romantic Revival was characterized by a focus on the individual rather than society or institutions. The Romantics believed that every person had a unique perspective and voice that should be celebrated and valued.

In conclusion, The Romantic Revival was a period of English Literature that emphasized individualism, imagination, emotion, and a love for nature. This movement reacted to the Enlightenment and emphasized the importance of human experience, emotions, and imagination.