Write a summary of the poem "To Daffodils".

Robert Herrick's (1591 – 1633) "To Daffodils" (1633) is a beautiful poem that compares the short life of daffodils to human life. The poet uses simple yet touching words to remind us how quickly life passes. He reflects on the fleeting nature of beauty and time.

In the poem, the poet talks to the daffodils. He feels sad because they bloom for a very short time. The flowers fade even before the day ends. This reminds him of how quickly everything in nature changes. He asks the daffodils to stay longer, wishing for more time with them.

The poet says that human life is also short, like the life of daffodils. Just like the flowers grow, bloom, and then wither, humans live, grow old, and die. He compares the shortness of life to springtime, which passes very fast. This idea shows how fragile and temporary life is.

Herrick uses images like morning dew and summer rain to describe life. These things are beautiful but vanish quickly. The poet reflects on how life is precious yet brief. Just like the daffodils, people cannot escape death. Herrick gently reminds us to accept the natural cycle of life.

"To Daffodils" is a heartfelt poem about the passage of time. Through the daffodils, the poet shows how life is beautiful but short. It teaches us to value every moment before it fades away.
