The Joy and Freedom of Childhood: In William Blake's poem "Nurse's Song" from Songs of Innocence, childhood is shown as a happy and free time. The children play outside in the green hills. They laugh and enjoy nature. Their nurse watches them with love and care. She is kind and does not stop their fun. When she hears them laughing, she feels calm and peaceful inside. The nurse tells them to come home as night is coming. But the children say it is still day and they want to play more. The nurse agrees and lets them stay out longer. She trusts them and knows they are safe. This poem shows that children grow best when they are free, loved, and trusted. Their joy is pure and beautiful. The nurse understands that play and happiness are more important than strict rules. The poem celebrates the sweet and innocent world of childhood.
