Love and Death: In "To His Coy Mistress," the speaker talks about love, beauty, and desire—but also about death. He wishes he had unlimited time to love the lady slowly and respectfully. He imagines spending thousands of years praising her. But he knows that life is short, and death is coming closer every moment. The second part of the poem shows his fear of death. He says that after death, beauty and passion will be gone. They won't be able to enjoy love anymore. So, he tells the lady not to wait. Instead, they should enjoy love now, while they are still alive and young.
